

The ordinary, everyday activity of leading an organisation

Most people think that leaders determine the vision, purpose, objectives and targets for an organisation, shaping it to become what the leader wants it to become. This seminar will challenge your beliefs about leadership, provoking debate around the reality of leading and the 'ordinary' kind of leadership needed in an uncertain world.

What will I learn?

Keynote speaker Professor Ralph Stacey, together with facilitator Angela Peacock, will encourage delegates to explore:

- What we believe makes a leader and what leaders really do
- Reality can be negative – exploring potentially neurotic and/or oppressive leadership styles and their effects on success
- The Hero Leader – myth or reality?
- Our current need for leaders who can bear uncertainty and anxiety well while contributing influentially to the development of their organisations
- A deeper understanding of total communications

Who should attend?

New and experienced leaders alike, along with leadership development professionals and anyone who is keen to discover more about the reality of leadership.

Keynote speaker

Ralph Stacey is Professor of Management and Director of the Complexity and Management Centre at the Business School of the University of Hertfordshire. He has devoted many years to addressing stability and change in organisations.

Facilitator

Angela Peacock is chair of the award-winning People Development Team. Forthright and entertaining, Angela is a popular keynote speaker and a regular guest on BBC Radio 5 Live's topical commentary programmes. She is also a consultant facilitator, working with executive teams and boards helping to develop solutions to a wide range of strategic issues.

What makes managers tick?

Why do people become managers, what do they think of the role and at what point in their careers do they make the step into a managerial career? ILM will reveal the findings of its research into the reality of being a manager today exclusively at this series of events.
